

When a person feels self-deserving, it can be called being entitled, which is the belief that one is deserving of special treatment or privileges. Other related terms include self-important, arrogant, narcissistic, or having a sense of entitlement, according to Psychology Today, QuillBot, and the Mayo Clinic News Network.

- Self-important: Having a high opinion of oneself and believing one's own importance is greater than it is.
- Arrogant: Displaying an offensive attitude of superiority, often in a condescending way.
- Entitled: Feeling that one is deserving of special treatment or privileges without having earned them.
- Self-conceited: Having an excessively high opinion of oneself.
- Narcissistic: Having an excessive interest in or admiration for oneself, often coupled with a sense of superiority and lack of empathy for others.
- Egocentric: An older term that is similar to self-absorbed, meaning a person is focused on their own interests and feelings.