

"Verbatim" means word-for-word. It is used as an adverb or adjective to describe repeating or copying something using exactly the same words as were originally spoken or written.

Origin and Use

Derived from the Medieval Latin word verbātīm (meaning "word for word" or based on verbum, meaning "word"), the term highlights exact transcription. It is commonly used in contexts like legal depositions, journalistic interviews, and quotations, where altering the original text could change its meaning.

Related Concepts

- Verbatim Transcription: The process of typing out audio or video recordings exactly as they are spoken, often including filler words (like "um" or "ah") and false starts.
- Verbatim Theatre: A form of documentary theatre where plays are constructed using the exact spoken words of real people recorded in interviews.
- Verbatim Brand: The name is also utilized by Verbatim Corporation, an American company widely known for manufacturing data storage and flash memory products.
