

Yes. I reviewed the website you provided: [Toowoomba Bulletin]

Synopsis

Toowoomba Bulletin is essentially a personal narrative and documentation website created by William D. Hodges concerning his estranged relationship with his adult daughter, Ashly Nichole Peterson, who is identified on the site as a psychologist in Toowoomba, Queensland, Australia.

The site's stated purpose is intervention. It presents the author's concerns about his daughter's personal history, their longstanding father-daughter conflict, her professional role as a psychologist, and the possibility that unresolved issues between them could affect her professional work.

The website contains a large collection of supporting material, including:

Letters written to Ashly

A detailed account of the family's history and their estrangement

Text and WhatsApp message screenshots

TikTok videos and references to her social-media statements

Family photographs

Documents relating to psychology regulation in Australia

Material concerning the author's allegations and Ashly's responses

Information about childhood experiences, discipline, foster care, divorce and family conflict

Discussions concerning the author's relationship with his granddaughter

Psychological/behavioral-health information

A section concerning the author's communications with therapists and professional bodies

A final epistolary section intended to bring the material together.

The central story

At the heart of the site is a father's account of a long-running family estrangement. The author acknowledges that he made mistakes during his daughter's childhood, including incidents involving physical discipline, and describes subsequent involvement by child protective services, foster care, family breakdown, and his own later psychological and physical hardships.

He disputes or provides alternative explanations for a number of allegations attributed to his daughter and argues that the history should be examined using the documentation he has assembled. At the same time, he repeatedly expresses that he loves his daughter and wants reconciliation, including renewed contact with his granddaughter.

An important distinction

The website is not presented as an independent investigation or neutral news publication. It is primarily William's account and collection of material concerning a personal dispute. The site itself asks visitors to review the material and decide how they interpret it.

Therefore, the allegations, interpretations, and explanations presented on the site should be distinguished from independently established facts. Some of the material may provide documentation of what people said or did, but that does not by itself establish that every interpretation made by either side is correct.

In one sentence

Toowoomba Bulletin is a large personal documentation/intervention site in which a father presents his version of a decades-long family conflict, his concerns about his daughter's professional role as a psychologist, and extensive supporting material in an effort to have the situation reviewed and, ultimately, to seek help and reconciliation.
